

We have to Imagine different ways to describe the End of things.

There's lots of ways of telling stories and ... this particular...

this particular pendulum let's call it for a second in which Arctic is melting it's not a pendulum that swings back like a lot of people think well eventually if it swings this way it will swing back this way and ... so I think we have to imagine different ways to describe the ends of things if we can imagine the world before us without us eh we will be able to imagine the world again without us. and I think, not to be too dark, we are not gone be here forever probably, we will be part of the cycle that is, that is it goes extinct and then comes back and then goes extinct again and and the ones that and as we look back into the deep past we understand how does cycles work, they're cycles and so of course our stories always have kind of good endings or good-ish endings you know like we move on so the story of Extinction is something that is too traumatic for people to understand.

A happyland.
