

This week was shorter for us with one day because of Easter, so we had even less days than usual. The topic, "body politics", could have been an interesting idea to think of. Unfortunately after a bit of collective research, to understand the theme deeper, we realised that it's like an endless sea, disappearing on the horizon. So we had to rethink our way of functioning, because the boundaries of the program don't allow us to dive deep into something together as a collective. At least this is how I feel... enormous topics with a really limited amount of time to research them. Also true, that as a collective we are still searching for our most defined way of productivity. So I think it's a good learning period for both ends. All in all it was still useful, because for me the understanding and researching of horizontal structure of working became more interesting.